Nationalism and feminism are two very closely linked ideologies. Webster's Dictionary defines nationalism as loyalty and devotion to a nation and feminism as the theory of the political, economic, and social equality of the sexes. Both nationalism and feminism deal with loyalty to a cause, in addition to fighting to support that cause, because it is felt that the cause is important.

Developed by theorist Sara Farris, femonationalism describes a particular form of nationalism within western European contexts. Farris defines femonationalism as a form of nationalism that deploys feminist critique and support for gender equality while simultaneously promoting xenophobic, racist, and anti-Islam sentiment and policy.

Nationalism and gender - Wikipedia

World feminists are skeptical of nationalism, and some even seek to eliminate nationalism from feminist discourse altogether (Alarcon, Kaplan, and Moallem 1999; Grewal and Kaplan 1994). Yet, as their deep entanglement at the incipient stage suggests, the relationship between Third World feminisms and nationalisms cannot be severed once and for all.
